This means creating, monitoring and updating policies and procedures; and keeping records of what personal data you hold, why you process it and how you protect it. You also need to demonstrate personal data privacy by design by recording how you reached decisions about processing which may impact the data privacy of individuals including staff and customers.

Questions to ask yourself:

- Do you have time to keep all your registration and paperwork up to date?
- Are you resourced to support and manage individuals requests about their personal data?
- Do you know when you need to produce a data protection impact assessment and what it needs to contain?
- Who will create and maintain your records of data processing and data catalogues?
- Are you registered correctly with the Office of the Information Commissioner?
- Are your data privacy policies comprehensive, and are they updated as your data processing changes and the law evolves?
