Administrative support, regulatory filings, paperwork

DSAR, DPIA, record of processing, data catalogue, policies, procedures..

New rules, new paperwork. The introduction of the GDPR brings a significant increase in your compliance workload. This means creating, monitoring and updating policies and procedures; and keeping records of what data you hold, why you process it and how you protect it. You have to monitor your suppliers to ensure that they protect your data appropriately. You also need to demonstrate privacy by design by recording how you reached decisions about processing which may impact the privacy of your data subjects including staff and customers.

- Do you have time to keep all your paperwork up-to-date?
- Are you resourced to manage and monitor data subject enquiries?
- What should you put in a Data Protection Impact Assessment, and when should one be completed?
- Who will maintain your records of data processing and data catalogues?
- Are you registered correctly with the ICO and any other relevant regulator?
- Are your privacy policies comprehensive, and are they updated as your processing changes and the law evolves?
- Do you have enough resource and expertise to manage a data breach?
